MURDOCH MCLEOD FATALLY HURT IN POCHE KING MINE.

A distressing accident occurred at the Pioche King mine early Wednesday which resulted in the death of Murdoch McLeod, a miner. It appears that McLeod, Tage Holthorn and Sylvester Succetti were employed on the night shift; that they had completed their round of holes; loaded them, attached the fuses, applied the fire to each, then climbed into the bucket and gave the signal to hoist. The bucket had not been raised more than five or six feet when something went wrong with the engine and notwithstanding the frantic effort of the engineer, the machinery refused to budge and three human beings were thereby left suspended in a perilous position down the shaft.

McLeod's companions, realizing the imminent danger they were in, scampered up the timbers to a place of safety. They thought McLeod would follow, but the latter evidently believed that he could descend to the bottom again, pull the splitting fuses and thus avert a catastrophe. He climbed out, his hands firmly clinched to the rim of the bucket, his feet dangling some distance above the bottom of the shaft. He then probably realized the error of not following the other men to the surface and made an attempt to get back in the bucket again. In this he failed and then dropped. Groping in the smoke from the burning fuses, he endeavored to carry out his first plan. But alas—he was too late. It is believed that he did manage to remove eight of the nineteen strings of fire, for only eleven shots were heard.

The victim was brought to the surface as soon as possible and lived about an hour. Strange to say, he bore only few outward signs of injury, but the shock, followed by the inhalation of gases hurried the end.

The deceased is survived by a widow and two bright little children aged 5 and 4, respectively. The funeral occurred Thursday forenoon under the auspices of the Pioche Miners' union of which the deceased was a member and interment was made in the local cemetery.

The coroner's inquest held under the direction of Justice Alfred Perkins, resulted in a verdict exonerating the company from any blame. It is understood however, that President John A. Kirby has signified his intention to lend substantial assistance to the afflicted family.
